This invention relates generally to the field of detonators, and more particularly to detonators with delayed detonation or detonation functions and methods of manufacture. For convenience, various descriptions, drawings, and claims may refer to the detonator shown and described herein as a perforated delayed detonation or PDD detonator. It is to be understood that this detonator has many applications other than to a perforated delayed detonation application. Almost all explosive detonators work by the same principle, but they often differ in the way they are made. A general discussion of the design and operation of explosive detonators appears in Encyclopedia of Explosives Technology, Chapman and Hall, New York (1998).

Basically, explosive detonators consist of a detonating explosive charge placed inside a casing and connected to the exterior by an igniting charge. This igniting charge fires the detonating charge either directly or indirectly depending upon the type of detonator. The connection between the detonating and igniting charges is usually a rod of metal, plastic, or ceramic material with an explosive material on either the detonating or igniting charge side. When the igniting and detonating charges are separated, an electrical current or series of electric signals is sent through the igniting charge. The igniting charge explodes, causing the igniting charge material to burn. Burned out gases or combustible fragments are released which are forced forward to compress a charge of detonating material. At the point where burn propagation has occurred, the igniting charge material returns to a fine, dry powder and initiates the detonating charge. The amount of burn is what determines the final detonation distance. The general operation of most detonators is as follows. An electric current, signal, or combination of both passes through the igniting charge and ignites the burning material. As the igniting charge burns, gases are released which are forced forward through the igniting charge and start to compress a charge of detonating material. The burning material then changes to a fine, dry powder that ignites the detonating charge. After the igniting charge material ignites the detonating charge, the reaction continues. The detonating charge

then propagates the burn, which is what produces the required detonation. At this point, the materials in the igniting charge return to a fine, dry powder. This return of the igniting material to a fine, dry powder is what produces the slow burn function. The slow
